SOCIAL JUSTICE SPOTLIGHT

Bereaved Parents Awareness Month

According to Beverly Beuermann-King, “There are so many expressions of grief after the loss of a child, that often it is hard to sort out how a bereaved parent is really coping.”

Grieving The Loss Of A Child

Beuermann-King describes the loss of a child as being “the most stressful and inconsolable of losses to deal with.” She continues saying, “It violates the natural order of things and it’s not fair for an innocent to see their dreams unfulfilled.” Some parents may feel as if they are ultimately responsible for their child’s safety and well-being which may lead them to feel like they have failed their child when loss occurs. When faced with grieving parents, many people do nothing or avoid any interactions, simply because we don’t know what to do or say. However, the month of July is designated as Bereaved Parents Awareness Month, a time for supporting friends and loved ones who’ve experienced the stress and loss of a child.

Tips For Building Resiliency Through Bereaved Parents Awareness Month

Don’t avoid the parents. The child’s death may make you very uncomfortable and it may make you contemplate the mortality of your own children. It is okay for you to not know what to say or how to help. A listening ear may be what they need the most. I love the sentiment that one parent received from a friend: “Grieve well. One day you will cease to remember him with tears and instead remember him with smiles.”

For many, the first year after a child’s death can be the most difficult. Anniversaries, birthdays and holidays will trigger pain and tears. Don’t avoid these dates but provide an opportunity for the parent to grieve and remember and not feel like they must hold the grief under control. YOU MATTER

Hi Everyone,

Thank you for the kind words you’ve shared with me these past couple of weeks. I’m humbled to know that my words have connected with some of you in a meaningful way. Some of the best advice I’ve received from mentors is to “say what you need to hear.” When I follow this advice, it’s always led to healthy conversations and ultimately a stronger community. So what do I need to talk about today? Hurt. Discomfort. Sadness.

My grandmother passed away earlier this week. My heart is heavy with my grief, but I’m also taking in my family’s feelings. Watching their pain is hard, but in some ways, I’m grateful to sit in that discomfort with them. It means that our relationships are genuine. We don’t have to pretend to be something we’re not. We can just be. I’m going out with friends on Saturday, and one of my friends had the most loving reply: “I still want to see you, whatever your mood.” Putting on a persona is exhausting, and, to tell you the truth, it’s not necessary. You matter enough to let go of that pressure of presenting a certain way and just be.

My hope for you all is that you learn to be with the people around you, including your family, friends, and Clients. I remember early in my career; I wanted to be the “best” social worker. I tried to solve problems. Looking back, I realize that my heart was in the right place, but my intentions were more hurtful than harmful. I let my ego get in the way. Any time someone came to me with a problem, I immediately started helping them look for solutions. Or, when someone was upset for more than 10 minutes, I’d want to change the topic by finding solutions. But how can you resolve something like grief? How can you permanently “fix” someone’s financial situation when there are so many systemic barriers? Sometimes I worry that we focus too much on “checking boxes,” and we forget about the healing power of just being with someone. Validating pain can be more helpful than trying to provide case management your way on your own time.

Maybe you think you would never do that. I remember thinking the same way, but when you convince yourself something will “never” happen, it’s a lot easier to ignore the behaviors/thoughts that are harmful. Social work is not like a textbook. You may know the “correct” way of practicing, but knowing doesn’t protect you from making those mistakes. The sooner YOU take the pressure off of you to always have the correct answer, the sooner you’ll start to thrive in every part of your life.

It’s so hard to hear someone else’s pain, and often our first response is to try to alleviate it. But our job as social workers is not to “fix” because our Clients are NOT broken. It’s about being with someone in what’s most likely a vulnerable time in their lives. My challenge to you is to look deeper than the textbook answers. Sit with that discomfort of asking yourself, what do my behaviors say? Am I here for this person, or am I letting my ego get in the way? For me, there are signs I’ve identified when I’m making it more about me than the person:

- Talking more than listening
- Trying to make someone feel better
- Trying to give solutions

Avoiding a deeper conversation because of my discomfort. Remember, you don’t have to be perfect, just human. You matter enough to show your authentic self. What parts of you allow you to connect with someone? Your humor? Your tears? Your hobbies? I’d love to know! Bonus points if you can list them without quoting the fancy words in your textbook.
