THE COVID-19 pandemic changed the social work profession and self-care needs have evolved. We identify a new self-care framework centering around a shared responsibility between social workers and their institutions. This session is sponsored by NASW Assurance Services.

Ly-Huong Barrett, JD, LCSW
Angela Lutts, LCSW-S

Are you thinking about starting an independent clinical practice but don’t know how or where to start? Or, do you simply want to review your current practices to ensure that they are up-to-date with laws and ethical standards? This workshop will provide you with a checklist of 5 things to help you start a practice with an ethical foundation or review the status of your current practice.

Dr. Micki Washburn is an assistant professor in the UTA School of Social Work. Among her research interests are health disparities related to mental health and substance misuse, applications of technology in behavioral health assessment and treatment, and mindfulness based clinical interventions for mental health and substance use disorders.

Sophia Fantus is an assistant professor-tenure track in the UTA School of Social Work. She previously worked as a clinical ethics fellow at Baylor College of Medicine and Houston Methodist Hospital. Her research interests are the transection of Social Work, bioethics, and public health to address barriers to socially just health care practices.

Professor Ly-Huong Barrett began teaching UTA in 2017. Her interests are service learning. She wants to ensure that students connect with communities while they have a practical experience in the classroom. “Service learning is important because of the partnerships created between UTA and agencies in the community,” she says.

Dr. Micki Washburn is an assistant professor in the UTA School of Social Work. Among her research interests are health disparities related to mental health and substance misuse, applications of technology in behavioral health assessment and treatment, and mindfulness based clinical interventions for mental health and substance use disorders.

Sophia Fantus is an assistant professor-tenure track in the UTA School of Social Work. She previously worked as a clinical ethics fellow at Baylor College of Medicine and Houston Methodist Hospital. Her research interests are the transection of Social Work, bioethics, and public health to address barriers to socially just health care practices.

Professor Ly-Huong Barrett began teaching UTA in 2017. Her interests are service learning. She wants to ensure that students connect with communities while they have a practical experience in the classroom. “Service learning is important because of the partnerships created between UTA and agencies in the community,” she says.

Dr. Micki Washburn is an assistant professor in the UTA School of Social Work. Among her research interests are health disparities related to mental health and substance misuse, applications of technology in behavioral health assessment and treatment, and mindfulness based clinical interventions for mental health and substance use disorders.

Sophia Fantus is an assistant professor-tenure track in the UTA School of Social Work. She previously worked as a clinical ethics fellow at Baylor College of Medicine and Houston Methodist Hospital. Her research interests are the transection of Social Work, bioethics, and public health to address barriers to socially just health care practices.

Professor Ly-Huong Barrett began teaching UTA in 2017. Her interests are service learning. She wants to ensure that students connect with communities while they have a practical experience in the classroom. “Service learning is important because of the partnerships created between UTA and agencies in the community,” she says.

Dr. Micki Washburn is an assistant professor in the UTA School of Social Work. Among her research interests are health disparities related to mental health and substance misuse, applications of technology in behavioral health assessment and treatment, and mindfulness based clinical interventions for mental health and substance use disorders.

Sophia Fantus is an assistant professor-tenure track in the UTA School of Social Work. She previously worked as a clinical ethics fellow at Baylor College of Medicine and Houston Methodist Hospital. Her research interests are the transection of Social Work, bioethics, and public health to address barriers to socially just health care practices.

Professor Ly-Huong Barrett began teaching UTA in 2017. Her interests are service learning. She wants to ensure that students connect with communities while they have a practical experience in the classroom. “Service learning is important because of the partnerships created between UTA and agencies in the community,” she says.

Dr. Micki Washburn is an assistant professor in the UTA School of Social Work. Among her research interests are health disparities related to mental health and substance misuse, applications of technology in behavioral health assessment and treatment, and mindfulness based clinical interventions for mental health and substance use disorders.

Sophia Fantus is an assistant professor-tenure track in the UTA School of Social Work. She previously worked as a clinical ethics fellow at Baylor College of Medicine and Houston Methodist Hospital. Her research interests are the transection of Social Work, bioethics, and public health to address barriers to socially just health care practices.

Professor Ly-Huong Barrett began teaching UTA in 2017. Her interests are service learning. She wants to ensure that students connect with communities while they have a practical experience in the classroom. “Service learning is important because of the partnerships created between UTA and agencies in the community,” she says.

Dr. Micki Washburn is an assistant professor in the UTA School of Social Work. Among her research interests are health disparities related to mental health and substance misuse, applications of technology in behavioral health assessment and treatment, and mindfulness based clinical interventions for mental health and substance use disorders.

Sophia Fantus is an assistant professor-tenure track in the UTA School of Social Work. She previously worked as a clinical ethics fellow at Baylor College of Medicine and Houston Methodist Hospital. Her research interests are the transection of Social Work, bioethics, and public health to address barriers to socially just health care practices.

Professor Ly-Huong Barrett began teaching UTA in 2017. Her interests are service learning. She wants to ensure that students connect with communities while they have a practical experience in the classroom. “Service learning is important because of the partnerships created between UTA and agencies in the community,” she says.

Dr. Micki Washburn is an assistant professor in the UTA School of Social Work. Among her research interests are health disparities related to mental health and substance misuse, applications of technology in behavioral health assessment and treatment, and mindfulness based clinical interventions for mental health and substance use disorders.

Sophia Fantus is an assistant professor-tenure track in the UTA School of Social Work. She previously worked as a clinical ethics fellow at Baylor College of Medicine and Houston Methodist Hospital. Her research interests are the transection of Social Work, bioethics, and public health to address barriers to socially just health care practices.

Professor Ly-Huong Barrett began teaching UTA in 2017. Her interests are service learning. She wants to ensure that students connect with communities while they have a practical experience in the classroom. “Service learning is important because of the partnerships created between UTA and agencies in the community,” she says.

Dr. Micki Washburn is an assistant professor in the UTA School of Social Work. Among her research interests are health disparities related to mental health and substance misuse, applications of technology in behavioral health assessment and treatment, and mindfulness based clinical interventions for mental health and substance use disorders.

Sophia Fantus is an assistant professor-tenure track in the UTA School of Social Work. She previously worked as a clinical ethics fellow at Baylor College of Medicine and Houston Methodist Hospital. Her research interests are the transection of Social Work, bioethics, and public health to address barriers to socially just health care practices.

Professor Ly-Huong Barrett began teaching UTA in 2017. Her interests are service learning. She wants to ensure that students connect with communities while they have a practical experience in the classroom. “Service learning is important because of the partnerships created between UTA and agencies in the community,” she says.

Dr. Micki Washburn is an assistant professor in the UTA School of Social Work. Among her research interests are health disparities related to mental health and substance misuse, applications of technology in behavioral health assessment and treatment, and mindfulness based clinical interventions for mental health and substance use disorders.